we will improve it with more features and functions. Live3D is an artistic platform for VTubers, an open-source toolkit to build VTuber Maker & Editor. Voto system Voter Voting is a procedure in which a voter marks one or more candidates (who may be present) in a ballot to indicate his or her preferences, in order of preference, for each candidate. In a system with more than two candidates, the voter may mark all or only some of the candidates. When a candidate receives a vote (voted vote) from a voter (voter vote), the candidate is awarded a vote, the number of which is shown by the voter. Some systems use the term to only refer to such a vote. A voter who prefers a candidate X over a candidate Y might express this preference by marking X over Y in the ballot, leaving Y unmarked, or marking Y over X. In each case, the voter has awarded X one vote and Y none. If a voter votes for both X and Y, he is said to have cast a split vote. A series of votes in which a voter marks every candidate in the ballot except for the first or last is called a streak vote, in contrast to a vote in which the voter marks every candidate except for the last. A streak vote may be used to express a voter's preference for a series of candidates over a group of other candidates, as in a pléiade vote. Voting is often seen as an act of political participation. Voters are often seen as stakeholders in the decision-making process. Most systems allow voters to cast votes on policy questions. In some countries, voting also may be an opportunity for a voter to express general support for a political party or party system. In some countries, a vote may indicate support for a specific political group or individual candidate. In some systems, a vote may be used as an expression of general political affiliation, or as a proxy for such affiliation. For example, in systems where the government is highly centralised and a large number of candidates compete for a single seat in parliament,
