I am well aware that many don't enjoy the idea of the Marvel Cinematic Universe as a whole. And now that so much time has passed, it's even harder to see all the connections that would help to build up a shared universe. There are enough red herrings that you wonder if Marvel just threw all the toys out to see what would fit into the boxes. But there is a clear connection between the origins of both Spider-Man and Captain America (at least, as it's laid out in the early 1970s) and the original Captain America comics, and that is the Red Skull. There's a lot of debate about whether Cap's original inspiration is the comic figure who goes by the same name, or the Nazi officer within the comics. Either way, the first Cap seems to be associated with Nazi Germany, and the story would be substantially different without the Nazi oppression of America. So it's not really a coincidence that that's the same image that greets Spidey when he enters the new Marvel Cinematic Universe. How does it connect to the other films? That's the question that I asked our writer Jackson Morris. First of all, in the new films, with the assistance of the recent events of Civil War, Cap finds himself in charge of the Avengers. So it's easy to see his look as a reference to the image of the Captain America statue that stood in Civil War. But that's not the only connection. Peter Parker's costume, and the death of Gwen Stacy, as well as Peter's continuing attempts to put things back together, are a direct result of the events of Civil War. So, when you put all of that together, it feels to me like Marvel established a
