Q: Types of motion of a body I have been studying the motion of a body which undergoes certain type of motion. I have also done the problem where the body reaches some maximum velocity. My professor mentioned to me that if we suppose that the potential energy of a particle is represented by $W(x,y,z)$ then the kinetic energy of the particle is also represented by the same potential energy. Here is the link to the answer. The answer given is correct but I want to do a formal proof. Where we have assumed that the potential energy is the same for any direction of the body. A: This is actually quite wrong and also not what your professor meant to do. The potential energy of a system of bodies is not a function of the position of the bodies. The potential energy of a system of particles, for example, is an integral over all points in space. The final velocity of a particle is given by its velocity at the end of some timestep: $\mathbf{v}(t) = \mathbf{v}_{\text{ini}} + \frac{\Delta t}{m} (\mathbf{F}_{\text{ini}} + \mathbf{F}(t))$ Where \mathbf{F}_{ini} is the force of every body from the initial configuration, $\mathbf{v}(t)$ is the velocity of the particle, m is the mass of the particle and Δt is the timestep. To find the velocity that the system has when it reaches a final configuration \mathbf{r}_{fin}
