The laparoscopic approach for resection of rectal cancer is now a popular procedure. However, in the case of tumors invading the pelvic side-wall, a laparoscopic procedure may cause technical difficulties. For this reason, we developed a completely extraperitoneal approach to laparoscopic rectal surgery, first reported in 1999. Here we describe the technical features of this procedure as applied in a patient with localized primary rectal cancer. Resection of a rectal tumor, after mobilizing the distal mesorectal fascia posteriorly and lateral to the ureter and medial to the peritoneum, is performed using a combination of laparoscopic and open techniques. A circular stapling device was used to transect the rectal and mesorectal fascia at the desired line of resection. To reconstruct the specimen, the rectum was closed in two layers. The resected colon and rectum were extracted through a small lower abdominal incision. This technique may be useful in laparoscopic surgical procedures for localized tumors of the upper and lower rectum, even in the case of tumors invading the mesorectum.From Traumatic Brain Injury to Chronic Pain. The traditional focus in the post-traumatic neuropsychiatry literature has been on the acute medical management of the injured brain and its damaging effects. However, the long-term sequelae of brain injury, including chronic pain, mood, and sleep disorders, are
