It allows a multiplicity of styles. The first part is called the descender, which is the point (usually the first letter of a word) that descends from the baseline. The second part is called the ascender, which is the point that ascends from the baseline. The thinnest part of the curve is called the b-line, and is placed between the descender and ascender. Because of this, a sans serif font can be used without loss of readability, and so can serif fonts, as long as the designer takes care not to push the horizontal lines too close to each other. The vertical lines that form the t-junction are known as the x-height. Because of this, a font that is too low (e.g., is too small) will result in a word being cropped too short. Main points of interest The letterforms are typically curves and are thus not typically very wide. The alphabets typically come in a range of widths, with thick and thin lines. This also applies to serif fonts. Because of this, it is not usually necessary to modify the font to make it readable. Because of this, the font can be used for small sizes without loss of readability. Technical details There are no true serif fonts, only a variety of fonts with strokes that are only noticeably different from true serif fonts when the strokes are overly exaggerated. This is because serifs and their variation are an evolved part of the writing system of every human language, and their absence from digital writing is simply the best compromise for digital media. Most software that implements TrueType or OpenType fonts allows the user to use a separate font-file for small and large sizes. This can be used to adapt the font to the current size, by setting the font-size to a fixed value. Another way to achieve this is to use conditional stylesheets. For example, one would have a style that applies to small sizes and another that applies to large sizes. Cursive Cursive writing includes letters that are formed by a pen or pencil, generally drawn without lifting the pen or pencil from the surface on which the letters are written. In addition, letters may be formed by modifying their outline or filling-in shape. A number of different fonts can be used in cursive writing, but the most common is a serif font that has a distinctive point and a
