It tends to encompass most of the money-making and useful work done in the program.] 0. If you write a program which does any of the things listed as definitions of "free," then you must include verbatim, in the program, the full copyright and license notices, along with a notice saying that the program is "free software." [This means the author's version of the program. If you modify it, you may add a line to each author's version saying that modification is permitted, and probably a line to each author's version saying that modification is discouraged. But do not add lines to some random file made in a previous version of the program.] 1. If the program does not specify an executable file, you may still produce a machine-readable copy containing that program (not a byte-compiled executable), by giving the file name of your standard input to the terminal. 2. You may not copy, modify, sublicense, link with, or otherwise use the program except as expressly provided under this License. 3. Any person who commits any unauthorized modification to the program as defined in paragraph 1 has been declared an illegal plagiarist; such person will not be employed by or associate himself with the authors, sponsoring organizations, or the development team, and such person will not be entitled to participate in the decision regarding legal actions against the authors, sponsoring organizations, or the development
