I remember the good old days when USB networking was a thing. When my VGN-NR32N notebook got a USB-Ethernet adapter, I immediately connected it to my home network. It was nice to have a printer/scanner and the network to share files with my friends. However, USB networking was never really developed further and these days the only officially supported USB-Ethernet adapters are supported only by specific model VAIO notebooks. The VAIO Easy Connect application is a simple, lightweight, free program that will allow you to connect your VAIO notebook to a home network. Once connected, you will be able to access files on the network, print documents, and browse web sites. The application is very simple to use. It can be started either by double clicking on the program icon in the Quick Launch area, or from the Start menu. After starting the program, you will see a login screen that requires only your user name and the password of your home network. You do not need a password to connect to a home network. Platelet activation, systemic inflammation, and endothelial activation following eclampsia. Eclampsia is one of the most severe complications of pregnancy, with high mortality and morbidity rates. Studies suggest that the platelet plays a role in the pathogenesis of eclampsia. We performed a case-control study of a large number of patients with eclampsia and a small number of normal pregnant women. We measured the plasma levels of von Willebrand factor (vWF), fibrinogen, thrombomodulin (TM), and soluble vascular cell adhesion molecule 1 (sVCAM-1), and the plasma levels of serum amyloid P (SAP) and C-reactive protein (CRP), as well as activated platelet-derived microparticles (PMPs) and platelet-leukocyte aggregates (PLA) in plasma samples of women with eclampsia and normal pregnant women. We found that eclamptic patients had significantly higher vWF (P=0.04), fibrinogen (P=0.009), and TM (P=0.0008) levels, and significantly lower SAP (P=0.04) and CRP (P=0.001) levels than normal pregnant women. Plasma levels of PMPs and PLA did not differ significantly between the two groups. We found a positive correlation between vWF levels and severity of eclampsia, whereas there was no correlation between plasma levels of TM, PMPs, PLA, fibrinogen, and vWF and the severity of eclampsia. These results suggest that eclamptic patients may develop systemic inflammation and endothelial activation, probably due to platelet activation. Legislative Matters (4/14/2019) (Travis
