Fetal alcohol spectrum disorder (FASD) is a chronic neurodevelopmental disease caused by prenatal alcohol exposure.

This disease is manifested by a variety of physiological and structural abnormalities in the central nervous system and the craniofacial structures that are associated with life-long disabilities. FASD affects a large portion of the population in the United States. It is estimated that as many as 1.2 million babies are born each year with FASD, which is ten times the number of babies born with neural tube defects. The prevalence of FASD is high among ethnic minority groups, and is especially high in pregnant women who abuse alcohol. Postnatal administration of ethanol in an infant animal can produce a syndrome that is reminiscent of human FASD. The rat models of FASD (alcohol-fed rat dams, fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS) and the animal model of fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS) progeny rats) have been used extensively to investigate the central nervous system abnormalities that occur in humans with FASD. The generation of a FAS progeny rat would be a useful model to understand the underlying neurodevelopmental mechanisms that lead to the FASD phenotype. However, a rat model has not been reported. The goals of the studies proposed here are (1) to characterize the inheritance of a FAS phenotype from a FAS progeny rat model, and (2) to establish an etiological relationship between the alcohol-related
