Although Chinese Premier Li Keqiang unveiled his government's economic planning blueprint on May 18, it quickly became clear that the term "reform" is being used in a way that differs significantly from official definitions and even more significantly from how it is usually understood in the West. In the West, the term "reform" usually connotes a transition to a market economy from a centrally planned command economy. The Chinese leadership also uses the term "reform" to refer to its various plans to move towards a market economy, but it has added as a further requirement that the "reform" be "scientific" ("zhuyecheng"). The relevant implications of this conflation are significant. First, in China the policy of "
