To clarify molecular mechanisms underlying neurodegeneration in diabetes, we investigated the relationship of gene expression changes with induction of diabetic peripheral neuropathy, we investigated N-methyl-D-aspartate receptor (NMDAR), postsynaptic density protein-95 (PSD-95) and neuronal nitric oxide synthase (nNOS) gene expression in diabetic rats. Western blotting was used to detect the protein levels of NMDAR and PSD-95 in the brains of rats. The nNOS gene expression was investigated by reverse transcription polymerase chain reaction (RT-PCR). The results showed that diabetic rats developed a significant and rapid decrease of the protein expression of NMDAR and PSD-95 in the cerebral cortex of rats, indicating a reduction of NMDAR and PSD-95 gene expression in the brains of rats. Moreover, the NMDAR and PSD-95 gene expressions in the hippocampus of the diabetic rats were significantly higher than those in the sham-operated rats (P<0.05). Therefore, NMDAR and PSD-95 gene expression may be related to the pathogenesis of diabetic peripheral neuropathy, whereas the nNOS gene expression in the brain may be related to the process of neurodegeneration.
