Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull has said China is currently Australia's third-largest export market, behind Japan and the United States. At a Friday panel discussion at the University of British Columbia, at which Turnbull was also joined by Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, he said the bilateral relations between China and Australia have achieved "great progress" since he became the country's leader in 2015. Turnbull added that Australia is "very close" to establishing a free-trade agreement with China, however, he added that this will not be agreed until after the relationship between China and the United States is fully resolved. "I am not naive in suggesting that in the context of the economic relationship with the United States, and the burgeoning trade relationship that Australia has with the United States, that China's economic relationship with Australia doesn't have a significant impact on our economic relationship with the United States, but our trade relationship with China doesn't exist at this stage," he said. "That is why I said the trading relationship is going to be negotiated when and if there is resolution of the issues relating to the bilateral relationship. But I think Australia is going to have very good relations with China and I anticipate

Fluorescent probes used in biological assays are designed to specifically bind to complementary molecules, such as, for example, analytes, present in the biological environment. When bound to their complementary target molecules, such fluorescent probes typically change color, absorb light at a different wavelength, fluoresce at a different wavelength, or exhibit some other detectable property. This detectable change in the fluorescent probe is indicative of the presence of the complementary target molecules in the biological environment. Fluorescent
