For those who believe in a free press, it's alarming to know that the NDP supported legislation that threatens to close down several of Canada's most recognizable news outlets. The newspaper industry, a once storied industry, struggles to stay afloat due to the ever-increasing costs of producing quality journalism. The coalition governments announced in Ottawa Friday that the changes will eliminate subsidies for dozens of daily newspapers, and reduce the amount that Canada's biggest papers can earn each year through tax deductions and other income. The changes will take effect July 1, 2015. Canadian Heritage Minister James Moore said the plan, which is expected to save the government tens of millions, reflects a broader decision to halt "an inefficient subsidy regime that dates back to the 1940s." The funding differential between subsidized and non-subsidized publications means that the subsidy is so large the government will want to ensure the press has to pay its own way. This is a move that seemingly takes the taxpayer for a ride – especially with so many of Canada's big cities still struggling with underfunding of their local news operations. In the end, it's a strategy that will never pay off. Some will criticize the government for not providing any money to the media business for a new innovation fund it was pitching. But regulators have called for a ban on newsprints and there are no signs the government is listening. The changes will eliminate subsidies for dozens of daily newspapers, and reduce the amount that Canada's biggest papers can earn each year through tax deductions and other income. The Canadian Press reported that Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne and the Ontario NDP are among those leading the charge to kill the subsidies. "The government also announced Friday that it will seek to eliminate dozens of daily publications from receiving the annual subsidy that is worth $1.8 billion a year, citing unsubstantiated claims from critics that they are too small to meet costs and requiring too many staff. 6a5afdab4c

What's New in the Buddy Comms?

Buddy Comms is a lightweight, snappy application that allows gamers to communicate with their friends while playing. High CPU load if many people are on Buddy Comms at the same time. Slowdowns while Buddy Comms is in use. Broken or not responding on my computer after a while. Description: SocialCaster - Buddy Comms replaces and extends SocialCaster in a lot of features. Buddy Comms is much faster than SocialCaster, so it does not suffer from the issues that SocialCaster had due to bandwidth problems. Buddy Comms can be used to chat with multiple people at the same time and automatically disconnects after the last person closes the chat. Buddy Comms has the ability to host private chat rooms and uses a database to store the chat logs, which helps Buddy Comms to be very fast even on older computers. Buddy Comms uses WebSocket to allow realtime chat while SocialCaster required a long polling request to get the realtime chat. Buddy Comms has a support for SSL, so it can be used safely on sites like Facebook, Twitter or Google+. Buddy Comms will replace SocialCaster in the future.
