Photoshop is actually a suite of image editing tools. There are a few different reasons why Photoshop is so common in the photo editing world. First, it's Photoshop CC that has long been the most popular upgrade. It comes with all the tools that a photographer, designer, and retoucher would need. Second, it's the software that actually introduced layers, which have now become an essential part of graphic design. Third, Photoshop has been a popular choice for computer manufacturers and other software vendors because it's a cross-platform program. The program is easy to teach and learn. It has a wide base of users who can find programs and tutorials. It's also easier to create content in Photoshop since most people already know how to use this program to create raster images. What makes Photoshop different from other image editing programs? In addition to the wide range of tools found in Photoshop, it has the same functions found in other popular editing programs. Some of these functions are: Aligning images, clip art, and layers Adding and removing a background color Adding and adjusting the brightness and contrast of an image Adding and adjusting text and graphics Adding special effects like blurs, emboss, watermarks, and color correction Although Photoshop has many features, it is not one of the most powerful image editing programs. There are many other programs that can do many of the same functions. In fact, some can do everything that Photoshop does. The most common example of this is the GIMP, which is free and open source. Historic Walk: Chinatown Today's walk was a great introduction to old San Francisco. Nearly 250 years old, Chinatown is full of history. One of the oldest neighborhoods in America, and one of the only neighborhoods in San Francisco to be declared a historic district, it's important to learn about the area and its rich history. Next we'll head to the famous San Francisco cable cars, and enjoy a tour of the Transamerica Pyramid. Take a Historic San Francisco Walk Posted on August 5, 2017 Historic San Francisco Walk – Chinatown Today we'll take a walk in the heart of one of San Francisco's oldest neighborhoods, Chinatown. From the many popular tourist areas we can see in the distance, it's easy to forget about the tough beginnings of this great American city. For 250 years or so, San Francisco was a Spanish colony, and then a territory of Mexico. In the mid 19th Century, San Franciscans rebelled against Mexican rule, and this uprising would later be known as the Mexican American War. Then on May 10, 1846, under the leadership of the Russian nobleman, Leland Stanford, the first transcontinental railroad came to California, and San Francisco was a boom town. In just a few years, the city boomed from a small settlement to a modern metropolis with a population of over 100,000. Many of the original structures from this time still stand, and today are mixed in with the modern buildings of this bustling city. A few of the landmarks that can be seen on the walk include the Bank of Italy, where we'll start our walk, as well as the notorious Chinese Opera House, which is no longer standing, but we'll have a great tour of the building on our next walk. From the Bank of Italy we'll cross the street to the Washington Square. Here we'll learn about what life was like for Chinese immigrants in America. It was a bitter time for them in America, as laws were in place to keep Chinese men from receiving many jobs. In order to receive a job, they were forced to leave China, which meant leaving their families behind. There are many walking paths along Washington Square, but today we'll take the Mission Street cable car to the Market Street cable car. This will allow us to walk along the market street, and take in the many lively shops and restaurants along

Story highlights Authorities: Film crew found dead in Mexico the same day a slasher film came out A kill count is still being determined At least three people have died and two others are missing in a Mexican drug gang violence that has become a traditional summer staple for the country's largest city, authorities said. At least three people have died and two others are missing following a shooting at a rundown barbershop where two groups were arguing, the state attorney general's office said in a statement. The state attorney general's office says the barbershop was in Acapulco's tourist center. The survivors said the violence began Friday as two men were leaving the barbershop. The statement says that the group of men that later came in were members of the same drug gang, the Jalisco New Generation (CJNG), including a leader from the gang. There are still no answers on exactly how many people were killed in the first murder, although there are indications between six and 10 people died, the statement says. In any case, this is the latest in a string of similar incidents in Mexico, where drug gang violence has now entered its traditional summer season. With the June to August peak season for Mexican tourism, authorities say they are expecting an increase in summer violence similar to the past four years. The first murders came about the same time a slasher film came out that included the CJNG. The killings have become tradition as the cartel has stepped up pressure on the weakened Mexican security forces, using assassinations and even a video that threatened movie theaters. The force of that terror is apparent in the fatalities. Around a dozen people were stabbed, including at least three women, Mexico's state attorney general's office said. At least five people were gunned down outside the barbershop, where two other men were killed when a gang member tried to stop them from leaving, said Jose Eduardo Orosco, a spokesman for the state attorney general's office. It wasn't immediately known whether the incidents were related. In a gruesome warning to the public, the gang posted a video that claimed responsibility and took direct aim at the local government. "If you are looking for justice, you have come to the wrong place. You have let the criminal continue," one of the men said in the video. "We will continue with crime and death, and this time, we will not stop at murders."
