Kinetic control of an N-methyltransferase-catalyzed racemic ester formation. In the current study, we examined the substrate specificity of the N-methyltransferase (MT)-catalyzed enantiomeric ester formation by addition of 2-(p-tolyl)acetic acid (PTA), an amido donor, to N-methyl-p-tolylthiourea (MTTU). The product esters were subsequently partitioned into a chiral carbonate salt, the (S)- and (R)-2-(p-tolyl)acetic acid enantiomers. The formation of the (R)-enantiomer was found to be the dominant pathway of the reaction of an N-MT with a prochiral thiourea. In addition, the kinetic parameters of the (R)-enantiomer formation with a series of thioureas indicated that the N-MT-catalyzed ester formation is controlled by the nucleophile/substrate (S/P) binding step. The results suggest that the MT-catalyzed racemic ester formation is also controlled by the S/P binding step. Uses of the Web are on the increase. Unfortunately, some websites use JavaScript from other websites and create a security risk. Why do websites need JavaScript? The answer is simple. Websites make it easy to create user-friendly experiences. For example, they can create menus with dropdowns, scrollbars with animations or text boxes with auto completion. JavaScript is what makes the web apps we use feel like, well, apps. The reality of using the web means that we are exposed to a lot of technology. We are using apps written for mobile devices. We are using apps and services from all kinds of developers. The problem is that all of these tools use JavaScript. JavaScript as a language is not inherently insecure. In fact, it has some very serious security advantages over other languages such as Java. JavaScript is a very small language. JavaScript applications on a website need to be small and run quickly. Most websites do not even have 50 different lines of code for a simple JavaScript applet. When JavaScript code is small, it becomes easier to analyze its purpose, to identify the source of security problems and to debug it. Furthermore, JavaScript is easy to read. JavaScript code can be written in a readable fashion and has a low error rate. It is not just the size
