Monoclonal antibody (MAb) 2610 was prepared from mice immunized with different subtypes of influenza virus hemagglutinin (HA). MAb 2610 reacts with the majority of A/PR/8/34 (H1N1) influenza virus strains. However, when the HA of an A/Texas/1/77-type (H3N2) influenza virus strain was examined in the same manner, MAb 2610 reacted only with a restricted subtype of HA expressed by the virus. This restricted pattern of reactivity was found in other H3N2 strains as well and was not observed when the nucleoprotein, matrix protein 2, or nonstructural protein 1 were examined. A neuraminidase (NA) titer of virus was used to indicate the variant strain. The NA titer of the A/PR/8/34 (H1N1)-derived viruses was higher than the NA titer of the virus isolated from the A/Texas/1/77-derived strains. In addition, the A/Texas/1/77-derived HA and NA had higher NA titer than did the H1N1 virus. These results were correlated with the results of hemagglutination inhibition assays performed with MAbs against the HA and NA, indicating that the A/PR/8/34-derived NA possesses HA-neuraminidase specificity and that HA is more antigenically heterogeneous than NA.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an electron beam exposure apparatus, and to a method of correcting an aberration of a charged particle beam. 2. Description of the Prior Art In electron beam exposure apparatuses used for manufacturing semiconductor devices, in order to realize a fine pattern, it is necessary to align the electron beam with a submicron order accuracy. As a method of aligning the electron beam, a raster scan
