The menus, tools, and palettes are similar to Mac programs and are used in a similar fashion, but since Photoshop is a Windows program, some text strings are different, and Windows text functions, such as cut, copy, and paste, are somewhat different from those in the Mac. If you have a multi-monitor system, you may want to turn one monitor off. It can be helpful to remove it if you don't need it. See Chapter 8 for tips on turning monitors off. In this book, Photoshop CS5 is used for all the images — and the screen updates are all created in that version.

Many ideas and instructions in this book may be easier to follow with the Mac version of Photoshop, so I mention that version of the program when appropriate. If you're an experienced Mac user and you want to use the Mac version of Photoshop (it's available as a separate download from the Adobe website), you can install it by following the instructions at the end of Chapter 8.

Using Differentially Expressed Genes to Detect Breast Cancer Susceptibility in BRCA1 and BRCA2 Mutation Carriers. To detect breast cancer susceptibility mutations in BRCA1 and BRCA2, often only one blood sample is sufficient. It is suggested that genes differentially expressed in breast cancer can be used as a second readout. In this study, by performing microarray analysis, we aimed to identify novel breast cancer susceptibility genes and to detect DNA repair variants. Compared to healthy controls, we identified 374 differentially expressed genes in BRCA1 and BRCA2 mutation carriers, of which 21% are BRCA1 and BRCA2 targets. Candidate genes were validated in a cohort of 20 BRCA1 and BRCA2 mutation carriers and 66 healthy controls. To this end, we used qRT-PCR analysis, conventional sequencing and the T7 assay to evaluate these candidate genes. We identified several genes previously reported in breast cancer, and identified novel breast cancer susceptibility genes: VAV3, RELN, SYNE1, HIF1A, and CLPTM1. Interestingly, all BRCA1 and BRCA2 mutation carriers presented a somatic BRCA1 C64A mutation. The presence of this BRCA1 variant is highly specific for BRCA1 carriers, with a sensitivity of 100%, suggesting that this variant is a useful additional biomarker to detect breast cancer risk in individuals with a previous family history.Q: Python: How to properly write a dictionary of lists?
