Reporting mental health issues to your GP or NHS Service

Mental health issues in adults

If you have noticed any signs or symptoms of mental health issues in a friend, family member, colleague or work colleague, you may want to report this to your GP or to your NHS healthcare provider. Formal training is available to health care providers who work within the NHS on how to recognise certain mental health issues and how best to respond. If you notice someone who is struggling with mental health issues, it may be helpful for you to call a helpline directly. This may be the best thing to do when you want to raise a concern or if you have thoughts that someone may be about to hurt themselves or someone else. The service can help you to get the right support or find the best place to get help, such as a local health service, mental health service or other more informal services, such as a charity. The SussexUrgentline number (03000 699999) can be called if you have concerns about someone's immediate wellbeing, or if you are concerned about someone who may be having thoughts of self-harm or harming others, or if you have thoughts that someone may be about to try to take their own life. Those calling the helpline receive professional, non-judgemental advice, including from a mental health expert, to help them to come up with a plan and/or to arrange for help with their mental health issue(s) or concerns, including personal contact with professionals for referral to appropriate services. If you are concerned about someone's wellbeing or mental health, you may want to call the service without actually asking for help, as you are only d0c515b9f4
