Based on this data, FIFA's in-engine physics have been reworked. This means when a player is caught in possession, his weight is reassigned to the support players, and the ball is no longer affected by the player's mass as it moves through the air. It can also mean that a close control player can grab and retain possession through his supporting team's defensive line. FIFA 20 was the first title to feature this new feature. However, FIFA 22 introduces a new level of physicality to the game, with players able to stick-slip from tackle to tackle, while being more likely to fall off balance after a tackle. There will also be a more obvious relationship between body types. In FIFA 20, there are five playing styles that players can choose from when playing in a goal-scoring position. They are: Inverted, Passive, Aggressive, Master, and Defiant. The "Passive" style was previously exclusive to "Masters" and "Defiant" players, while the "Aggressive" style had been the only one available to "Masters" players. In FIFA 22, the "Aggressive" style will be available to all players as part of the "Master" rank. However, players can still only choose "Passive" as a style for "Masters" in FIFA 22. Each of the styles will have its own strengths and weaknesses. "Passive" players are slow, compact and very hard to beat off the dribble. They are very risky when making decision on the ball, but tend to play the ball out from the back and look to pass rather than shoot. In other words, the “Passive” style is for players who don’t want to chase the ball or strike it themselves. “Aggressive” players are fast and tough-to-beat. They are more aggressive when beating a challenge and often work hard for themselves. This style is about being tough to defend against rather than being unpredictable about when and where to shoot. “Aggressive” players are like a sprint version of the “Aggressive” style. They are fast and unpredictable and are much like the
