Galveston, Texas (CNN) -- Civil rights leader the Rev. Jesse Jackson says he will stay in the GOP's good graces as long as the conservatives nominate the "prettiest" candidate, adding that the party has "grown up enough" not to exclude minority voices. "If they do it right, they'll have a majority, because there is nothing like a black vote in America," Jackson told CNN in an exclusive interview. Jackson, an early backer of Sen. Barack Obama, reiterated that the Illinois senator's campaign is "on fire." But he suggested the race might be closer than anyone thinks. "I am convinced that Barack Obama can win. I'm just not convinced that he will win. "I'm surprised that the African-American community hasn't gotten it in a million years that there can be more than one black candidate for president in a race." "I am willing to go there as long as they pick the prettiest one, and that goes against my heart, but I'll go there. I've been there, I know where they are coming from. So, as long as they do it right, they'll have the vote," Jackson said. "They've grown up enough not to exclude an African-American. And they're smart enough
