The treatment of clinical orthodontic emergencies, such as intruded teeth, has been shown to be difficult as a consequence of root resorption. One attempt at addressing this problem has been to transplant a root segment into the defect. To evaluate the allograft in an animal model in which a true periodontal ligament (PDL) is produced by the mesenchymal cells. The incisor of Fischer albino rats was treated orthodontically, and root resorption measured by cast radiography. After root resorption, a root fragment was removed, and replaced in its original position. Four weeks later, the animals were killed and the roots prepared for histological examination. Radiographs of the transplanted roots showed new bone around the grafts, with a PDL attachment present. Histological
