The size of the warehouse is about 8GB, so I decided to check my costs on a bacpacs instance. For context, the warehouse is migrated onto another server every year for maintenance reasons. I chose the partial_concat query (it's the most effective way in which I could recreate the transfer according to the sys.dm_db_replication_operations table): SELECT * FROM [FQLCreateDB].[dbo].[temp_table] x CROSS APPLY ( SELECT TOP 1 * FROM [FQLCreateDB].[dbo].[FULL_table] y WHERE (SELECT MAX(datetime) FROM [FQLCreateDB].[dbo].[temp_table] WHERE y.id = x.id) >= y.datetime ORDER BY datetime DESC, id DESC ) y The query took 20 minutes to complete. The only way to reduce this time was to create the intermediate table directly from the source table's temporary table before running the cross join. Why is this query so slow? Are there some major problems with this type of query or is this really the expected performance? Note: I am trying to optimize this query for the following reason: 1. The warehouse gets updated once a year. New options of each products will be stored in the warehouse. Before updating the warehouse, I want to delete all the last data of each products. What I do is to create an empty temporary table and, using the query above, extract data from this table. 2. Once the warehouse is updated with the new options, I want to replace the old options with the new ones. So, I run the same query again on the temp table created by the query above. The last step is to reinsert data in the original table. I also noticed that in the results of the query above, there is no duplicate rows. This means that no data were lost.

Long-distance is a game of makes and breaks, and often, those breaks are more work than it is worth. There's no doubt that when it comes to expanding beyond the immediate, where people are involved, the process is often fraught with additional complications and pitfalls.
