Possible correlation of visceral pain induced by thyroid function and psychoneurological complaints in patients with amiodarone-induced thyrotoxicosis. Alterations in thyroid hormone levels are associated with pain but the underlying mechanism is unknown. The authors investigated the relationship of change in mental state and visceral pain in amiodarone-induced thyrotoxicosis (AIT). A total of 73 patients with AIT were enrolled. A cross-sectional study was performed to compare the prevalence of self-reported nausea, abdominal distension, dizziness, and headache between the hypothyroid and euthyroid state. To test the concurrent validity of self-reported changes in mental state with questionnaires to examine pain-related and anxiety-related disorders, as well as sexual function. Visceral pain was reported in 19 (26.0%) of the 73 patients. Patients with AIT reported an increased prevalence of nausea, abdominal distension, and dizziness (52.8%, 21.7%, 28.8% vs. 25.4%, 8.2%, 10.1%, respectively). The prevalence of self-reported nausea and abdominal distension was lower in patients with AIT in the euthyroid state than in the hypothyroid state ($p = .004$ and $p = .015$, respectively). Furthermore, AIT in the euthyroid state was significantly correlated with less self-reported nausea and abdominal distension ($p = .023$, $p = .047$). There were no significant differences in self-reported headache, sexual dysfunction, or anxiety- or pain-related disorders between the hypothyroid and euthyroid state. Patients with AIT report more visceral pain in the hypothyroid state than in the euthyroid state and this may reflect the depressive symptoms of hyperthyroidism. The authors hypothesize that the pathogenesis of AIT-associated pain may involve thyroid hormone-related visceral hyperstimulation, depression, or cognitive dysfunction.Q: Why is $.fn.on in jQuery?
