"A direct application of HDO technology as a.It is frequently necessary for one person to operate and carry out the necessary movements for a number of peripheral optical instruments. Examples of such instruments include protective spectacles, microscope instruments, Galilean and Keplerian telescopes, binoculars, medical instruments, surgical instruments, and diagnostic instruments. For example, during surgery, the surgeon may find it necessary to bend, raise or lower the head of a patient to perform a surgical procedure, and must frequently remove and replace a helmet worn by the patient to allow head movement. During an examination of a patient, an ophthalmologist may need to remove and replace the protective spectacles of a patient to determine the condition of the patient's eyes. Such instruments as binoculars and microscopes may require that the operator hold the instrument with one hand while manipulating the eyepiece with his or her other hand. In some cases, the operator must manipulate both the instrument and the eyepiece to position the instrument correctly and also to conduct a line of sight measurement for testing retinal function. As a result, the operator of such instruments frequently suffers a painful and repetitive strain injury involving some of his or her body joints, in particular the neck and the shoulder. Such accidents and occupational injuries are not only highly unpleasant for the operator, but they can also be difficult and expensive to treat as well as inconvenient for the patient. It is known in the art to provide a protective hood made of a soft protective fabric, such as a rubber suit made of an elastomeric material, which is suspended over the operator's head. The hood encases the operator's head and is a substantially friction-free fit on the operator's head. 595f342e71
