Field of the Invention This invention relates to an image signal processing device for storing image signals of an arbitrary program into an image memory and reading out the stored image signals as required to reproduce a moving or still picture.

2. Description of the Prior Art Recently in the course of making a program, a photogram, and the like (hereinafter referred to as "image signals") to be stored in a recording medium such as a magnetic disc, it has become conventional to effect writing and reading out the image signals in the form of a series of frames (e.g. field-by-field) which are made by dividing a one image into a predetermined number of areas in a vertical scanning direction. For example, in the field-by-field system, one image is divided into four images and stored in a four-line memory such as a register, and the four images can be read out and displayed one after another. Therefore, if a frame memory, having only one line of memory, is used and the read address is shifted every frame, all the images of the one program may be stored into the field memory. Such structure is convenient, but if the capacity of the memory is increased to accommodate a large number of image signals, the time for storing and reading out the image signals will be increased. Further, the conventional method in which the image signals are divided into fields and each field is stored into the memory requires additional time for shifting addresses, and complicates the circuit arrangement. In U.S. application Ser. No. 033,103 filed on Aug. 5, 1979, now U.S. Pat. No. 4,398,645, there is proposed a method for storing image signals divided into frames in one channel and shifting a read address every frame, thereby storing a plurality of frames in the same channel of the memory and reading out one frame for every one write operation. However, when the shift address is read out after one frame is written, the
