We can supply a fully regulated "at the point of care" injector, which will deliver a volume of drug into a target tissue. We have shown that it is possible to develop a new injector to suit the local environment (location), be it wound tissue, tissue that needs to be identified (for example, injecting directly into a coronary vein) or a needle-less injector for delivery into for example a fluid such as an intravenous fluid that is not easy to extract from patient. We can provide an injector which has the features to allow monitoring of the procedure which is very important in critical care; robust, reliable and has automatic stop functions that are suitable for delivery of a few micrograms or up to 20mls of drug per dose. Flexi Health are a global business with an experienced engineering team to advise on the design of the injector which will both be in use in the local setting and in other parts of the world. Q: How to debug the hanging method call in a Objective-C block I'm really afraid that this question is a duplicate, I really tried to search this but I only found topics like this one. I'm doing an asynchronous call to an API which returns a task. At some point in the execution I need to access a property from this task. The problem is the execution hangs at this point. This code snippet should give you a good idea about the problem:

@implementation APIWrapper { Task *task; } - (void)someApiCall: (id) extraParams { if (task!= nil) task.someProperty = extraParams; else [NSEException raise:...someException]; } @end

The API is a third party non-commercial library which does asynchronous calls. The task is nil until the the method returns. So if I run this code in the simulator I get the expected result: // "task" is nil at this point +

(void)someApiCall: (id) extraParams { if (task!= nil) task.someProperty = extraParams; else [NSEException raise:...someException]; }

If I run this code on the device, the method call hangs. And the task is not nil. If I put a breakpoint at the line `task.someProperty = extraParams` I can see that the block inside the method is never reached. It seems that this is somehow related to IOS. Probably it has something to do with the fact that the thread goes back to the main thread, and there the block is never reached. Any idea how to debug this?

Thanks

A: The API is a third party non-commercial library which does asynchronous calls. Then don't put a UI component on the main thread.
