And there's a reason for that. When I was a student teacher, I expected some performance evaluation from my supervisor. But the evaluation system that was presented to me only had grades and evaluations from the prior year. The evaluation was on students' previous achievements. The superintendent's approach was a classic school-reform. He said that he didn't want teachers evaluating teachers. So that's what they did. After a year of evaluating teachers, my supervisor gave me a letter praising my performance, indicating that I was a solid teacher. After I graduated from my student teaching program, I continued to teach. I was now a first-year teacher. When my supervisor and I were evaluating teachers, he could tell when I was in competition for an award of any kind. He never gave me an award. What he did for me was assign me to one of his favorite
