Q: Does the character of 然 have any influence on the way the sentence is interpreted? In my native language there is a sentence that goes something like this: 然[然] 然[然] 然[然] 然[然] My interpretation of it would be something like "However, it is not necessarily true that". But I'm curious if there's any influence on the way the sentence is interpreted if I replace the part after the 然 with 然 to make the sentence "It is not necessarily true that (the character) never happens, rather it is not necessarily true that". Like for example: 然[然] 然[然] 然[然] 然[然] I am not an expert in Japanese, so I'd appreciate if someone could help me understand if there is any influence on the way the sentence is interpreted in this case, if the character of 然 makes any difference to how it's interpreted. A: It depends on the context if I'm right. But I'm curious if there's any influence on the way the sentence is interpreted if I replace the part after the 然 with 然 to make the sentence "It is not necessarily true that (the character) never happens, rather it is not necessarily true that". It doesn't change the meaning. Both are true statements, meaning that 然{然} never happens and 然{然} never happens. 然[然] is understandable but not understandable in only one way. You can interpret it in several ways as you wanted to. But you can not turn the 然[然] to 然[然]

Q: Am I violating web.config by encrypting sensitive information? I have a company website that is going to be back-linked. I'm worried about the performance of the website and therefore the security of information that can be accessed by other webpages such as the login for the website and personal information that can be accessed through records that are still on the company website. I'm considering using the web.config to encrypt sensitive information such as user names and passwords. If the information is encrypted in the.config I can no longer see or access them on the live server when testing but I can see them in the.config when I test locally because it's not encrypted. Does this pose any security issues or can I stick to my current way of doing things without encrypting the information? A: If you are just protecting username and password, then it's not worth encrypting in a.config If the information is encrypted in the.config I can no longer see or access them on the live server when testing but I can see them in the.config when I test locally because it's not encrypted. Does this pose any security issues or can I stick to my current way of doing things without encrypting the information? Yes, you are going to run into problems with this. Testing locally will expose it to tools which will let them extract the passwords. This is not a good idea. I'd recommend against this. For more information see: Asp.Net 3.5 app web, simple file sharing is a pain in the butt A: I would suggest looking into ASP.Net membership, which will handle authentication for you and help you decide whether or not you want to encrypt that information. That being said, it's not a good idea to store sensitive information such as that in the web.config file. A: If your application does not use ASP.NET Membership, you can make a page where you show your login/password. This page will be available in your "web development environment" and is not encrypted. This way you are in complete control of your sensitive credentials. Constitutive expression of rab5 and its redistribution on the plasma membrane of recomb
