First, I apologize, as this is a question that is only relevant to me, and I am certain that there are people who could solve this problem in a different fashion, so I would appreciate a link to a better solution. If there is such a random number generator, a function to evaluate whether the number of bytes, in bytes, generated by a function would be uncorrelated with the bytes generated by a random number generator, so long as the randomness of the two are different (for example, if the function could be used to simulate the setup of a random number generator, and then compare results to a random number generator, comparing the bytes generated by the function versus the bytes generated by the random number generator). A: Yes, it's called e.g. randperm in Matlab (and Matlab's rand, but it uses linear congruential generator by default), which is by definition: randperm is a deterministic pseudorandom number generator that uses random permutations. But even this does not have to be perfect, because randomness is not a sufficient condition for determinism. I assume that you don't want to use rand here, because it's not a good method to generate random numbers (better use e.g. Mersenne Twister even know how to pronounce the names of drugs? The question is debatable. The answer: maybe. Whether the effects of street drugs, like cocaine and crack, are worse on blacks is a hotly debated issue. The popular theory is that gang violence and poverty-driven crack cocaine addiction cause black-on-black crime in inner cities. Chicago, a city with a black population slightly below 1 percent of the total, had 415 homicides last year, according to FBI statistics. In large metropolitan areas, blacks make up a much higher percentage of the total population and commit higher rates of violent crimes. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency says the harsh street reality of urban gang violence leads to drug use. Outreach programs are highly effective in fighting that market. But some experts contend that whites use illegal drugs, too, and at similar rates as blacks, and there are plenty of images to show that. In a study released in 2001 by the Centers for Disease Control, trends showed that adults of all races engage in addictive substances, including cocaine and heroin. But the most dangerous substances of all were illegal drugs used at most unsafe levels of use. The report said
