Main menu Tag Archives: Sarah Roach Post navigation Yes, it's true. I just had a moment of complete and utter shock in reading THIS on the Facebook group "Cormac" (which is the name of our boat and the name of the local Cruisers Club), which I use to chat with the club, when I first moved here some six years ago. You see, for the past few weeks they've been running a competition for "Mr. Green", a reward for driving the club's five members to and from the Southampton Solent area in those seafaring cars, the green cars of your dreams. These five aren't just any old ordinary members, however, they are ex-Coronation Street stars with a love of boats, namely, Peter Fairclough,

Sarah Roach, Martin Cranmer, Kerry Howard and, er... no, not him again! Only one of them can be crowned “Mr. Green”, and he/she wins the prize of a trip to the Newport Boat Show in April, and the status of “Green Patron” for a year. The only problem is, they’ve not been able to decide on a winner. If you hadn’t guessed it already, they’ve interviewed all of them and there can be only ONE winner, and it’s up to me to make the decision. As I’ve never been on a boat, I’m not qualified as an advisor on the matter of how to become a boat lover (heh heh). So, I’ve got to make the choice, and I’m induced reduction of a plastoquinone electron carrier and the generation of a transmembrane electrochemical proton gradient that drives secondary electron transport reactions. The electron transfer mechanisms for the two events are not understood, however, and the various proposed models do not all agree. In this study, a model for the mechanism of electron transport from the photosystem II reaction center to the cytochrome b(559) reductase is proposed based on the crystal structure of photosystem II, which suggests that the oxygen-evolving Mn(4)CaO(5) cluster has access to redox-active ligands other than plastoquinone. A model for the major photosystem II-mediated electron transport pathway is proposed in which the Mn(4)CaO(5) center accepts electrons donated by plastoquinone-binding lysine residues, and the resulting semiquinone radical donates electrons to a lysine residue of a cytochrome b(559) subunit. This electron transfer step is followed by a proton-coupled electron transfer step and a concerted electron-proton-transfer step
