Photo by IndyGunFreak The city council of Austin, Texas is set to vote on a new municipal code which would stiffen the municipal penalty for the possession of a small amount of marijuana - enough to catch a citation. Gawker reports that the new code would increase the penalty for misdemeanor marijuana possession from a $100 fine to a $250 fine. If you're charged with a misdemeanor possession, you get a court date, and the fine is imposed at the time of sentencing. These punishments get paid for by the American Civil Liberties Union, who has helped file lawsuits against the city to try to bring down these marijuana fines. The highest-profile of these suits was one that focused on misdemeanor citations, a suit which was heard in March by Texas' 5th Court of Appeals, and which has partially-reduced or even-reduced these fines. "Voters are never directly involved in the process of passing laws or approving amendments, but through the ratification of an elected representative body they can pass laws to prevent the infringement of their rights," said Judge Jack Countiss, according to Gawker. The Texas Supreme Court has already ruled on this type of fine, and has ruled that the current penalties were unconstitutional. In January, Judge Countiss was recused from the case, and the other justices ruled unanimously that the fine was fine and not unconstitutional. The ACLU will be arguing that the city's new municipal code is constitutional in its Aug. 9 vote, likely counter to arguments presented by Judge Countiss in the March case. Alley has been following this for some time, as he's been a plaintiff in several of the lawsuits related to the city's municipal marijuana code. He was arrested after he was found in possession of a mere 0.47 grams of marijuana, which, in some states, is no crime at all. "It's outrageous that the state is systematically crushing the rights of people like me," Alley told Tech Dirt. "To me, being a freedom fighter isn't really a job, it's a lifestyle. My freedom matters to me more than my career. I can never make enough money to buy freedom, but freedom is more valuable 1cdb36666d
