Near infrared transillumination imaging using light-emitting nanoparticles. Near-infrared transillumination imaging is a new imaging modality that uses light-emitting nanoparticles, such as quantum dots, to generate optical contrast. We have developed a microscopy system with which single nanoparticles can be precisely localized, using reference-free algorithms. This system was used to generate images of Cy3.5-labeled nanoparticles in conjunction with illumination by a 532-nm diode laser. Transillumination imaging was compared with bright-field and epifluorescence microscopy, and the results suggest that this novel imaging modality may have the advantages of higher resolution, image correlation, and increased sensitivity. Microfluidic technology for isolation of circulating tumor cells. The use of microfluidic devices in the fields of medical diagnostics, physiology, and chemistry has recently been expanding, but much development has been focused on in vitro diagnostics in the area of blood analysis. In this report we describe a microfluidic device fabricated with poly (dimethyl siloxane) (PDMS) for circulating tumor cell (CTC) isolation. The microfluidic device presented in this report is unique because the microfluidic network is fabricated with PDMS instead of poly (methyl methacrylate) (PMMA). PMMA is a common material for fabricating microfluidic systems because it is optically transparent and can withstand high temperatures. PDMS, however, has several advantages when compared with PMMA, including low cost, light weight, easy fabrication with a mold, and biocompatibility. PDMS, for example, is used extensively
